Elizabeth Angellatta	2330 Eutaw PI	Baltimore	21217	Yes		I work at a restaurant in downtown Annapolis and I'm concerned about potentially reopening restaurants at limited capacity. Firstly, I received an email yesterday informing me that the county would not be reopening dog parks because they are a place for people to congregate and because the recreation and parks staff are stretched too thin. If concerns over public health can't be placed in the hands of government agencies then why does it make sense to put that responsibility on privately owned restaurants and their staff? Secondly, as tipped employees, if we're allowed to open at 25% capacity, for example, it is a safe assumption that restaurant employees will no longer be eligible for unemployment but will have to take up to a 75% pay cut only to return to work with extra responsibilities while putting ourselves and others at risk. So, I'd like to ask, how will our lost income be supplemented until we're allowed to operate with full capacity? Thanks for reading, I'm looking forward to your response.
Michael Keale	910 Monroe Street	Annapolis	21403	Yes		I agree that this virus is not going away anytime soon, But neither is the seasonal flu which in this country takes out more people each year then this virus has so far in this country, we don't shut down every winter.' If your sick or of compromised health stay home. I say the rest of us should be able to go about our lives, carefully but continuously. And as far as that leftist mayor in Annapolis goes through him out. Mike Keale
